Editorial

Kristy L. Archuleta, Ph.D.

There has never been a better time to be part of the development of financial therapy. Recently, I attended a conference that involved the study of financial planning, but the focus of the conference was highlighting how the integration of multiple disciplines could help to inform the understanding of client financial behavior, how financial advisors think about clients, and how financial advisors can help clients. Sounds a little like financial therapy to me. The conference reaffirmed that financial therapy has a place at the forefront of understanding client financial behavior and how to help clients achieve overall financial well-being.

Recently, the Financial Therapy Association Board of Directors released a simplified definition of financial therapy to help better communicate what financial therapists do. A financial therapist helps a person think, feel, and behave differently with money to improve overall well-being. A financial therapist does this through evidenced-based practices and interventions that help to resolve underlying issues limiting self-growth and wellness. As a way to develop the study of financial therapy, JFT aims to publish research that informs our understanding of how people think, feel, and behave around money, as well as how those thoughts, feelings, and behaviors can be successfully altered to better one's quality of life. JFT also publishes advances in theory and research to develop financial therapy standards and practices.

This issue features four articles, two profiles, and one book review. Each article adds a new contribution to the field of financial therapy. First, Dr. Asebedo applies a conflict resolution framework to money arguments. Next, Drs. Rea, Zuiker, and Mendenhall explore financial management practices among emerging adult couples. In the third paper, Drs. Ann Woodyard and Cliff Robb help to add further description of financial satisfaction by looking at what consumers know, feel, and do from a financial perspective. Then, Dr. Russell James offers a unique theoretical analysis of mortality salience and financial decisions.

This issue features a practitioner profile of Beth Crittenden and a scholar profile of Sarah Asebedo. Both of these individuals play an important role in the development of financial therapy. Finally, we conclude with a review by Neal Van Zutphen about a book entitled, The Seven Principles for Making Marriage Work. This could be a helpful book in working with couples!

As I noted in my previous editorial, the Journal of Financial Therapy will have its first special issue in Summer of 2017 that focuses on stress and money. This issue will be edited by Dr. Sonya Britt, Kansas State University. In addition to this upcoming special issue, I am excited to announce that JFT will have its second special issue in Winter 2017 on the topic of couples and money. Dr. Jeff Dew, from Brigham Young University, will be the special issue editor. If your research is in the area of couples and money, you have most certainly cited Dr. Dew's research. If you would like to submit a manuscript that is related to couples and money, please submit by June 2, 2017. We are looking to solicit quality papers that feature financial therapy practices, experiments, and other research related to couples and money.
