Opinions expressed in this journal are those of the contributors and are not necessarily those of the Burgon Society. Neither the Editors nor the Burgon Society can vouch for the accuracy of material in the journal or accept legal responsibility or liability for any errors or omissions that may be made.

Front cover: Women in a suffrage march in New York provide an example of how socio-material associations generate the perception of material objects being outside their 'proper place', such as academic gowns in a political demonstration. The idea is explained beginning on p. 14.

Editor's note

Not so long ago e-books were expected to replace books printed with ink on paper. Publishers, whose livelihoods depend on the profits associated with hardbacks and paperbacks, would go out of business when a reader's single Nook or Kindle could replace an entire home library. In the contest between old and new, victory would go to the greater convenience and lower cost of digital.

It didn't happen that way, or it hasn't happened yet. Analog books actually saw a rise in sales in 2015, when about 17 million more printed books were sold worldwide than in the year before. True, that amounted to an increase of only a slim 3 percent. More significant are the flat sales of e-books. At one time they were expected to account for as much as 60 percent of book sales, but they have settled closer to only one-quarter of all books sold.

I like to think that is good news for the kind of work we are interested in. For one thing, text in print is the primary way we share our ideas and discoveries. It's a storage tool that does not require a technological intermediary to operate, so it doesn't require updates to software or hardware—unless you count eyeglasses and the stronger prescriptions that come with age.

For another, the preference for the physical object that is a book, where it's easy to thumb through pages looking for your scribbled notes, suggests that the tactile experience of putting on a college gown and hood for the first time may come with a certain pleasure. Not only does the touch of the fabric send messages through our fingers, the look of a new graduate in academic dress sends a message to everyone who looks her way.

Technology won't stop improving, of course. One day everything, even education, may be digital. Yet even those graduates who today complete their course work from a distance, taking classes online and rarely setting foot in a lecture hall, may choose to attend a graduation ceremony remotely too. And some who do go so far as to wear a gown or don a cap while watching from home.

The Transactions is taking another digital step. In the next few months the journal will find a new home online, hosted by New Prairie Press. It's a web service whose aim is to share scholarly research for free, and to make finding research easier for scholars. In addition to posting our articles, as we will continue to do on burgon.org.uk, the librarians who operate New Prairie Press will assist us by making sure that meta-data of all sorts are attached to each document so that search engines will have an easier time of finding the work our contributors publish.

This all means we will be available to read on paper, to download via pdf, and to discover through digital object signifiers. Wearing a gown to your virtual library is optional.
