Editor's Note

When my wife and I were planning our wedding, one of the questions to answer was how many hymns we should ask the congregation to sing. We both enjoy choral music, and as much as we wanted our friends and family to sing with us we wanted to keep from expecting more of their vocal enthusiasm than was realistic. The church's music director helped settle the matter. He pointed out that when wedding guests sing together, they support the couple with one voice.

Something similar can be said about wearing academic dress for a ceremony. Recently my university installed a new president, for the second time since I have been teaching there. The basics of the ceremony remained the same, but with two big differences. First, this year's ceremony moved to the campus auditorium, a setting far more fitting than the basketball arena where the previous installation had been held. The second change, however, reduced the ceremony's pomp.

When the new university president was installed in 2009, the faculty were asked to participate in their academic dress. We lined up for the procession—actually, the typical American shuffle—and were seated in front of the platform along with representatives of about a dozen nearby universities. The audience sat around us. In a photo of the event, at least one hundred faculty members and visitors were in cap and gown.

By contrast, eight years later the invitation to the faculty to participate in the procession stipulated that no academic regalia would be worn, even though the faculty participants would be ushered in as a group. There was no explanation for the instruction, which seemed particularly odd considering the new president was a retired Air Force general whose last job as an officer was serving as the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to President George W. Bush. In other words, a person fully accustomed to serving amid uniforms. The decision to forgo university uniform was probably made, as at most institutions, by a committee and then approved by the honoree.

Reading the instructions again, I tried to imagine how the procession of faculty would appear. All I could think of was a funeral, with the family of the dearly departed being escorted to the first pew just before the service begins.

The actual ceremony was not so melancholy as a funeral, of course. But from where I sat, with the rest of the guests, the look was similar: the ceremony got underway and the participants were introduced as they entered. At the appropriate time, the emcee announced the faculty and dignitaries from neighbouring universities, and in came the group. The first eight were in cap and gown, a surprise to me until I realized they were the visitors, who apparently were permitted to wear the symbols of their degrees. The university faculty, on the other hand, wore standard office dress — and numbered all of about a dozen—out of a faculty of more than twelve hundred.

Why was the group so small? I would like to think that they enjoy the show of unity that cap and gown create and were put off by the instruction not to wear it. Without academic dress to unite them, they were just part of the crowd. In its absence, academic dress was all the more noticeable. Those who were permitted to wear it supported the university visually, with their dress. Had the faculty been allowed to wear their academic dress, the array of their robes would have represented greater support for the university, represented by one of the centuries-old traditions that universities share.
