Seven Fallacies about Culture in “Cultural Competence”

The following seven fallacies often characterize representations of culture in the conceptualization of cultural competence:

1. Culture is fixed, knowable, and certain. Such approaches rely on comparison and classification based on beliefs, customs, and material artifacts.

2. Culture members necessarily share in a common collective identity associated with a given culture. The premise is that a given society or social group has a given culture, with the consequence of placing individuals in broad categories.

3. The concept of cultural identity is synonymous with a given set of characteristics. This conceptualization overlooks the intersectionality of dimensions of social identity.

4. All cultures have equal status and access to power and privilege in society. Dominant cultures affect norms, assumptions, attitudes and behaviors of what is right and accepted.

5. Cultural identities are not influenced by existing contexts, including political, structural, economic, and power-based realities. Cultures are shaped by power relations and both macro-forces such as institutional systems, legal and governmental regulations, as well as micro-interactions among individuals and groups.

6. Culture is disassociated by society from physical attributes. Society tends to make the physical “cultural” such as by viewing members of a given racial group as having the same culture.

7. Membership in a cultural group is fixed rather than fluid. Individuals can leave groups or enter new ones and may have differing relationships with the identity of a given cultural group.
