Studies in 20th & 21st Century Literature

Volume 32
Issue 2 *Theater and Performance in Nuestra
América*

Article 12

6-1-2008

Being Edward James Olmos: Culture Clash and the Portrayal of Chicano Masculinity

Nohemy Solózano-Thompson
Whitman College

Follow this and additional works at: <https://newprairiepress.org/sttcl>

Part of the Film and Media Studies Commons

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Noncommercial-No Derivative Works 4.0 License.

Recommended Citation

Solózano-Thompson, Nohemy (2008) "Being Edward James Olmos: Culture Clash and the Portrayal of Chicano Masculinity," Studies in 20th & 21st Century Literature: Vol. 32: Iss. 2, Article 12. <https://doi.org/10.4148/2334-4415.1686>

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by New Prairie Press. It has been accepted for inclusion in Studies in 20th & 21st Century Literature by an authorized administrator of New Prairie Press. For more information, please contact cads@k-state.edu.

Being Edward James Olmos: Culture Clash and the Portrayal of Chicano Masculinity

Abstract

This paper analyzes how Culture Clash problematizes Chicano masculinity through the manipulation of two iconic Chicano characters originally popularized by two films starring Edward James Olmos - the pachuco from Luis Valdez's Zoot Suit (1981) and the portrayal of real-life math teacher Jaime Escalante in Stand and Deliver (1988). In "Stand and Deliver Pizza" (from A Bowl of Beings, 1992), Culture Clash tries to introduce new Chicano characters that can be read as masculine, and who at the same time, display alternative behaviors and characteristics, including homosexual desire. The three characters in "Stand and Deliver Pizza" represent stock icons of Chicano masculinity. In the skit, these icons are forced to interact with each other and through this process become more complex and accessible representatives of Chicano masculinity. They are able to communicate with each other to create something tangible. The pizza of course is a comedic metaphor for contemporary American society—the new melting pot.

Keywords

chicano, Edward James Olmos, masculinity, pachuco, Luis Valdez, Zoot Suit, Jaime Escalante, Stand and Deliver, Culture Clash, melting pot, America, Mexican-American culture

Being Edward James Olmos: Culture Clash and the Portrayal of Chicano Masculinity

Nohemy Solórzano-Thompson
Whitman College

The California-based comedy trio Culture Clash problematizes Chicano masculinity through the manipulation of two iconic Chicano characters originally popularized by two films starring Edward James Olmos – the pachuco from Luis Valdez’s Zoot Suit (1981) and the portrayal of real-life math teacher Jaime Escalante in Stand and Deliver (1988) in their skit “Stand and Deliver Pizza.”

Culture Clash, composed of the US Latino performers Richard Montoya, Ric Salinas and Herbert Sigüenza, is one of the most prominent Chicano/Latino performance troupes in the US.¹ Founded in 1984, the comedy trio has written and produced over fifteen original works, guest starred in short films and feature-length motion pictures, and had a regular comedy series on Fox Syndication in the early nineties. “Stand and Deliver Pizza” is one of the final skits from their performance piece A Bowl of Beings, which debuted at the Los Angeles Theater Center in June 1991. In 1992, the performance was aired on PBS as part of its Great Performances series and later released as a VHS tape. In 1998, the script of A Bowl of Beings was included in Culture Clash’s first published anthology, Culture Clash: Life Death and Revolutionary Comedy.²

In “Stand and Deliver Pizza,” Culture Clash tries to introduce new Chicano characters that can be read as masculine, and who at the same time, display alternative behaviors and characteristics, including homosexual desire. In the skit, an older Chicano man steps in to stop a fight between two Mexican-American youths. One of the youths is a cholo, a Chicano gang-banger, and the other is a rockero, a Chicano heavy metal fan. The older Chicano man, a composite of the two Olmos' performances, alternates between being a pachuco and Jaime Escalante while trying to teach the men how to use their ganas to make pizzas.³ The pachuco-Escalante character wants the young men to understand that they are facets of the same identity and wants them to become positive examples of Mexican masculinity.⁴ By working together, the youths realize that they are sexually attracted to each other. The pachuco-Escalante character tries to repress this realization but is powerless to stop it.

The three characters in "Stand and Deliver Pizza" represent stock icons of Chicano masculinity. In the skit, these icons are forced to interact with each other and through this process become more complex and accessible representatives of Chicano masculinity. In addition, they are able to communicate with each other to create something tangible. The pizza of course is a comedic metaphor for contemporary American society – the new melting pot.

From Zoot Suiter to Math Teacher

The PBS Great Performances "Stand and Deliver Pizza" skit begins with the playing of the big band song "In the Mood" by Glen Miller against a background of a newspaper. Suddenly, a man's hands appear and tear the paper in two. The camera pans back revealing the man (played by Herbert Sigüenza) against a softly lit background as he assumes the iconic pachuco slanted pose. In this instance and throughout the performance, Sigüenza will exaggeratedly assume the pose while making a key point. He will begin the pose by slouching his torso back and complete it by positioning his hands by his side and slightly tilting his head to the front. This movement becomes a physical leitmotif throughout the skit to both denote the pachuco-Escalante character's authority and to establish his dominance over the other two characters.

Sigüenza's pachuco appears on stage wearing a zoot suit with a cream colored jacket and dark pants. After assuming the pachuco stance, he snaps his fingers and the music stops. As the camera pans closer to him, the character begins talking. He says, while gesturing with both hands, "It was the secret fantasy of every vato in and out of the Pachucada to become... a math teacher" (Culture Clash 98). After he says "math teacher," the character snaps his fingers again and the music returns. He then quickly changes into Jaime Escalante, as played by Olmos. He turns his back to the audience during this brief costume change; a cap replaces the pachuco hat, the jacket is taken off to reveal an embroidered vest, and the character now wears glasses and has acquired a potbelly. After slowly turning around to face the audience, he reassumes the pachuco pose and continues his introduction of the skit.

As Sigüenza embodies the pachuco, he draws heavily from the 1981 film version of the play Zoot Suit directed by playwright Luis Valdez and starring Olmos as El Pachuco. The play chronicles the trial and incarceration of Henry Reyna in 1940s Los Angeles. Reyna is a referent to the real-life Zoot Suiter Hank Leyvas, one of the Mexican Americans falsely accused in the Sleepy Lagoon Murder Trial of 1942. Olmos' character represents Reyna's guide and alter ego; he also serves as the narrator of the film. Olmos began playing El Pachuco in the stage production of Zoot Suit in 1978 in Los Angeles and later in Broadway; for this role, Olmos earned a Los Angeles Drama Critics Circle award, a Theatre World award, and a Tony award nomination. The embodiment of the pachuco on stage and on screen would become one of Olmos' most significant and iconic performances, to the point that one could argue Olmos is perceived to be an eternal pachuco. This is certainly how Culture Clash presents him in the skit.

In Valdez's play, a giant facsimile of a newspaper serves as backdrop at the start of the play. El Pachuco emerges from this slit using a switchblade to separate the pages while "Perdido" by Duke Ellington plays.⁵ After El Pachuco enters the stage in Zoot Suit, he slowly dons his pachuco outfit and strikes the pose. After this ritual, he snaps his fingers to stop the music and he begins his monologue to introduce the play. Culture Clash's dialogue is a variation from El Pachuco's speech. In Zoot Suit, he says, "It was the secret fantasy of every bato/ in or out of the Chicanada/ to put on a Zoot Suit and play the Myth/ más chucote que la chingada" (Valdez 26). Culture Clash's staging plays homage to Zoot Suit's beginning, while at the same time signaling the end of the pachuco era. This is most evident in Sigüenza's dialogue, which situates the vatos of his time as "in and out of the Pachucada" (Culture Clash 98). This alteration of El Pachuco's speech suggests two differences affecting Chicano masculinity today. First, Culture Clash creates the possibility of vatos "in and out" as opposed to the either/or suggested by El Pachuco in Zoot Suit. This distinction is fundamental to understanding the characters in "Stand and Deliver Pizza," especially the rockero. Second, Culture Clash situates their construction of masculinity after "the Pachucada," while Zoot Suit chronicles the beginning of that era. Thus, Culture Clash is creating a timeline that introduces their generation as emerging from the mythic pachuco experience. Although this is of course not historically accurate, it echoes what Arturo Madrid says in his essay "In Search of the Authentic Pachuco," where he argues that although the "Pachuco is the most fascinating figure in the world of the Chicano" (17), his representation is from the outside and often through distorted lenses that include "the nostalgic stereoscopes of Chicano recollection" (20).

In the skit, Culture Clash is attempting to both present the mythical pachuco and also deconstruct its status within the Chicano imagery. This is achieved by the transition from pachuco to math teacher, but also by the interactions with the other younger characters in the skit. While the pachuco became a math teacher, the cholo and the rockero are still in search of an identity. The appearance of the pachuco represents a nostalgic allusion to the supposed glory days of the Chicano Movimiento and introduces an imagined and romantic agent of change and resistance. The classic pachuco character in Movimiento cultural production encompasses an idealized masculine identity that is constructed as if existing outside of the mainstream. In Zoot Suit, El Pachuco's power is manifested through his linguistic liberty and his ability to resist any challenges against his authority. He in fact is able to transcend the real-life events affecting those involved in the Sleepy Laguna case and remain unchanged by violence, persecution, and discrimination.

Culture Clash's manipulation of the pachuco character suggests nostalgia for this romantic view of Chicano masculinity, while at the same time, pointing out its irrelevance in contemporary Chicano identity politics. This is not to say that real-life pachucos did not exist or were not important in the development of Chicano identity and politics, but rather that this particular romanticized portrayal of the pachuco is not enough to describe or encompass contemporary Chicano identity and performativity. Furthermore, El Pachuco of Zoot Suit represents an exclusive construction of Chicano masculinity that alienates women and sexual minorities. In her book about Teatro Campesino, Yolanda Broyles-González attributes Zoot Suit's theatrical success to the figure of El Pachuco and his revalorization within the Chicano Movimiento. His prominence however, she says, gives the play "an overbearingly masculine bent" (200).

As the pachuco dissolves into Jaime Escalante in "Stand and Deliver Pizza," Culture Clash depicts the transformation of Chicano subjectivities in the media from a romanticized figure of resistance that draws its power from its refusal to engage with the mainstream to the figure of the inspirational math teacher. By creating the juxtaposition of the pachuco with the math teacher in this manner, Culture Clash comically portrays the rigid roles available to Chicanos in mainstream media and ridicules the extreme transition from one role to the other.

Sigüenza merges both pachuco and Escalante performances in his characterization in "Stand and Deliver Pizza" through the use of a Chicano form of caló [slang] and by the pachuco stance leitmotif. Sigüenza's caló draws from several literary and cinematic linguistic portrayals of the Los Angeles Chicano male speak. His slang is constantly referring to Olmos' multiple performances, as well as to the use of these words in key Chicano performances and texts. In the PBS performance, Sigüenza strategically includes additional utterances of "y qué" 'so what' to the end of some of his statements that do not appear in the 1998 published script. The phrase alludes to the Chicano Movement and the construction of a Chicano identity that does not seek compromise. The "y qué" is meant as a challenge to the audience, as if daring them to challenge his authority. But this is a false challenge, as the audience cannot challenge his onstage presence and instead he deceptively affirms his own assertions.

As the Escalante character appears, Culture Clash draws on the 1988 Ramon Menéndez film Stand and Deliver, also starring Olmos. This film version of the true-life story of Garfield High School math teacher Jaime Escalante became an important vehicle for Olmos and other minority actors to break into the mainstream. Stand and Deliver created a new genre of films about the Mexican American Los Angeles experience that adopted the quintessential American dream formula. Through hard work (strategically referred to as ganas in the film), a math teacher at Garfield High is able to turn cholos and cholas into college material through calculus. Of course, Menéndez's film is not naive in its depiction of the challenges faced by Escalante and his students; the film shows us the barriers faced by the students when placed in conflict with other Chicana and Chicano students and their families, as well as the questioning of their success when the College Board doubts their test results. Ironically, the College Board sends two officers, an African American and a Latino (played by Andy Garcia) to question Escalante and his students. Through this juxtaposition of different characters that encompass different aspects of the Chicano experience (on the one hand, the cholo who doesn't support his friend's academic progress; on the other, the vendido 'race traitor' character played by Andy Garcia; and finally, the unsympathetic and cynical teachers at Garfield who wish Escalante to do the minimal and not challenge the students intellectually), Menéndez's film suggests that Escalante's performance of Chicano masculinity is the key to success in an unequal world.

In contrast to the pachuco, Olmos' performance of Jaime Escalante provides a figure of resistance that works within the mainstream and whose goal is the creation of a Mexican American middle class. Thus, Culture Clash's melting of the pachuco into a "math teacher" suggests a radical change in the performance of Chicano resistance – and implicitly criticizes such a transition. Although the pachuco was a romanticized figure, the Escalante character is an equally unsatisfactory alternative and presentation of Chicano masculinity. The character in the skit is ultimately more interested in his own agenda – which includes the exploitation of his Chicano workers, self-aggrandizement, and the repression of queer and alternative sexualities and identities as will be evidenced in the skit.

The pachuco-Escalante character however is able to bring together two other Chicano masculine identities and suggest the creation of a new subjectivity. He is able to do this because of his own flaws and his own position of authority as a veterano and mentor.

As his Chicano disciplines learn to work together and develop as subjects, the pachuco -Escalante character is left behind.

A vato from East LA

After the pachuco transforms into Escalante, he resumes his narration and introduces the dramatis personae of “Stand and Deliver Pizza.” The characters of the cholo and the rockero join him on stage and he briefly describes them for the audience. The pachuco-Escalante first describes the character of the cholo (played by Ric Salinas) as: “Look at the cholo with his shiny calcos... twin mirrors of despair, look at his nethead, holding his greasy hair. Looks like Spiderman” (Culture Clash 98-99). The character appears on stage with padded shoulders to make him look bigger—he is wearing a large button-down red shirt and black pants.

The pachuco-Escalante character’s introduction of the cholo attempts to demasculinize him by first ridiculing his existential Chicano angst and then laughing at the hairnet by implying he is dressed like a cartoon superhero. The reference to the existential angst is a recurrent theme in A Bowl of Beings; here it references the pachuco-Escalante character’s belief that the younger generations have not suffered in the same manner as the members of his generation. The reference to angst is one of the unifying themes in the entire play and suggests that in each skit, the characters are trying to resolve this angst by understanding and then performing their Chicano identities. After the rockero is introduced, the skit’s main action starts. I discuss the rockero in the next section.

After these introductions, the pachuco-Escalante briefly explains to the audience that after retiring from Garfield High School, he decided to open a pizzeria. However, he continues his social activism by continuing to help Chicano youth. As the main action begins, the pachuco -Escalante is in his pizzeria when the cholo arrives to apply for a job. As he arrives, the cholo quickly picks up on the rivalry alluded by the pachuco-Escalante earlier, and he tries to counter by asserting his identity over that of the math teacher through an attempt at linguistic prowess. This challenge clearly reflects the cholo’s understanding of the pachuco performance as one based on a linguistic portrayal of resistance. It also suggests that the cholo through his use of caló is the apparent heir to the pachuco, at least in Culture Clash's imagery. This is later reinforced when the pachuco-Escalante character briefly allies himself with the cholo when the rockero arrives at the pizzeria.

The cholo introduces himself to the pachuco -Escalante speaking very fast and gesturing wildly with his arms, "Hey. Mr. Escalante. I hear you need somebody to make and deliver pizza three P.M. to midnight, Monday to Friday órale con safos, ese, vato, carnal, loco homeboy" (99). As he says the last word, the cholo crosses his arms and tries to imitate the pachuco stance but does not slant as much and leaves his arms crossed on his chest. The pachuco-Escalante character is not impressed by this challenge and quickly admonishes the cholo by saying loudly, "Órale, don't try to out-Pachuco me, ese." As he utters this, he adopts the pachuco stance and menacingly nears the cholo, who backs down from his challenge and hunches his shoulders. This brief exchange establishes the rules of their interactions; the pachuco is not to be challenged in his own turf.

After establishing the hierarchy, the pachuco-Escalante decides to interview the cholo for the position of delivery boy. The cholo once again tries to challenge the pachuco-Escalante by verbally and physically answering obscenely to one of his questions. The character, here playing more the math teacher and not the pachuco, implies that the cholo's intellectual ability is suspect and hence he relies on vulgarities. He tries to prove this to the audience by asking the cholo, "I bet you don't even know who Shakespeare was?" (99). The cholo quickly changes his pose and reads dramatically from a Shakespeare play. The pachuco-Escalante character is at first shocked and wordless; after he recuperates, he nods his approval of the cholo's familiarity with the British canon. This exchange echoes the beginning monologue of El Pachuco in Zoot Suit, where the character switches from caló to perfect English (as indicated in the stage directions) to say, "The Pachuco was existential/ for he was an Actor in the streets/ both profane and reverential" (Valdez 25). As with El Pachuco in Zoot Suit, the cholo's speech creates the juxtaposition between imagined street and cultured talks to suggest that the cholo is in fact an actor and not a real-life person.

The cholo character as presented by Culture Clash is a composite of stereotypical representations of gang-bangers and Chicano criminals popularized by Hollywood films—and often played by the same Chicano actors, Danny Trejo, Jesse Borrego, Jacob Vargas, and Juan Fernández—as well as a subversive interpretation of this character that suggests he is not that he seems. The Shakespeare quote is meant to not only make us laugh but also to counter our notions about this type of Chicano performativity. The cholo is not as shallow as Hollywood makes him out to be.

Wassup rockero

The third character in the skit is the rockero (played by Richard Montoya). In the introduction, the pachuco-Escalante character describes him as: “Look at the rocker with his tight puto jeans, makes his ass look like an apricot, que no?” (99). This description of the character will become relevant later on in the skit, but it is suffice to say that the Escalante character is already constructing the rockero as not masculine given his appearance. This is not only however due to the tight jeans, but rather because of the character’s cultural interests and the performance of his identity. The rockero has not embraced a Chicano identity or an acceptable (at least to the pachuco-Escalante) Mexican American masculine performance, as his alliance to rock and roll music by non-Mexican Americans is a sign of malinchismo ‘race treason’ within the context of this performance. That is to say, that the rockero’s musical taste (which is what embodies him and characterizes him as his name implies) is outside of the stereotypical limits of the Mexican American community and identity. To be a rockero means to be defined by something seen inherently as not Mexican American and hence not Chicano.

The rockero arrives on scene after a case of mota-induced munchies and orders a “burrito” (100), mispronouncing the word. Montoya’s interpretation of the rockero relies on the character’s ambivalent relationship to his ethnic identity. This is most clear in his voice. Montoya adopts a high-pitch nasal voice and distorts Spanish words to try to suggest a non-familiarity with Spanish; yet instead, this achieves quite the opposite effect, as he is not able to “fake” his accent. The rockero’s outfit also suggests his distinctness from the cholo and the pachuco-Escalante characters; he has a black leather jacket, jeans, and long black hair. After the rockero’s arrival, it is clear to the audience that the rockero and the cholo are mortal enemies, as foretold in the introduction of the skit.

The rockero and the cholo immediately engage in a linguistic fight with each other about the other's performance of masculinity. Their dialogue is full of jokes that reveal stereotypes and perceptions about Chicano masculinity and performativity. The rockero characterizes the cholo as uncultured and violent. He says of the cholo, in a very nasal and high-pitched voice, "jalapeño-eating, lettuce-picking, para bailar la bamba loser... [and then] Los Tigres del Norte eight-track tape listener" (100-101). This criticism contextualizes the cholo within a Mexican and Mexican American community with very strong cultural ties to Mexico. His taste for Los Tigres del Norte, traditional food, and music—and his description as the descendant of farm-workers—suggests that the cholo's true crime (in the eyes of the rockero) is his class status and the reflection of it in the character's taste. The cholo responds to these attacks by calling the rockero, "coconut... surfer... gringo... [and] honky" (101), and in the PBS version, the cholo adds "white-boy-want-to-be"—all nouns that imply (as did the pachuco-Escalante character's previous description of this character) that he is not behaving as a Chicano should. The rockero responds to all insults with a final word, "Hispanic" (102).

The amalgamation of these negative words and the ending of insults with Hispanic, which upsets and shocks both the cholo and the pachuco-Escalante, reveal one of the goals of the pachuco-Escalante character. He is trying to counter the performance of the Hispanic identity as he is interested in these men becoming and performing Chicanness. In this context, Hispanic means mainstream and deracinated; and Chicano means radical and authentic. The pachuco-Escalante however is unable to conform their performance of Chicano masculinity to his own vision.

The pachuco-Escalante is able to break the fight by giving them a motivational speech about peace and harmony. He then hires the rockero by taking advantage of the character's bad math skills. He first offers $2.50 an hour, and after the rockero complains, he raises it to $7.50 a day. The rockero tries to count with his hands and is stumped; he accepts what he thinks is a good deal. This humorous exchange highlights some of the limitations of the pachuco

-Escalante's supposed good nature; he is quite happy to exploit his workers in order to make a profit. His previous assertions about goodwill and wanting to work with Chicano youth become suspect after this negotiation.

Chicano Subjectivities and Pizza a la Olmos

After the pachuco-Escalante convinces both men to work together, he wishes for the men to publicly make up and affirm their friendship. The character first asks them to do the Chicano handshake. The rockero who is still struggling with his Chicano identity suggests he "might not know it" (102). His use of words is key; it is not that he does not know it, but that he has chosen to perform his identity as someone who might not know it. In other words, the "passing" that he is accused of is really a shield against racism and discrimination. It is clear he is a Mexican American; he just wishes he had to chance to choose his own performativity and subjectivity, be it Hispanic, Chicano, Latino, or simply American.

The pachuco-Escalante character however is a product of the Chicano Movimiento and is not willing to compromise this way; he wishes for his charges to declare themselves as public Chicanos. He responds to the rockero's words by saying courtly, "Yes, you do" (102). This declaration affirms the pachuco-Escalante's character conception of masculine identity – if you are a Mexican American man, you must adopt Chicanidad.

Once the pachuco-Escalante character has convinced both men to do the Chicano handshake, he asks them to hug. This initial request shocks both men, but he leaves them no option. The men hug and immediately separate and act nonchalantly. The cholo stands tall and big; the rockero appears unaffected. Then the pachuco-Escalante character shocks the men by telling them to kiss. The men tentatively approach each other and suddenly begin to passionately kiss. Their kissing becomes a total body act as they embrace and the rockero grabs the cholo by the butt and lifts him up in their fervent embrace. At the sight of this, the pachuco-Escalante character is shocked and speechless – this second reaction being the most powerful one. After the kiss the men separate in a mock recreation of their previous nonchalant stances, but this time, they are very affected. The cholo appears disheveled – his glasses are partly off and his hairnet is messed up. The rockero is fanning himself, sweating profusely, and playing with his long hair.

The pachuco-Escalante character regains his use of language after this act of transgression and homoerotic desire has occurred. He immediately mocks their affection by stating, “Are you two Tijuana putos finished?” (103). This comment affirms the audience’s perception of the pachuco-Escalante character’s contempt for queer desire, and it also situates his understanding of queer subjectivities in a particular cultural context. The suggestion that the men are behaving like Tijuana putos situates queerness south of the border and within the context of prostitution. The pachuco-Escalante character is not allowing the creation of a queer Chicano subjectivity within his construction of the Los Angeles Chicano experience. However, the homoerotic act has taken place and that cannot be erased from the experience of the characters and the audience.

The PBS version of the skit ends with the pachuco-Escalante character leading the men into the workshop to instruct them in the making of pizza. The pachuco-Escalante character tries to insert once again his own notion of Chicano masculinity through his instructions for correct and proper pizza making, he states:

I am going to teach you how to make the house special. The “Edward James Olmos” pizza! First you, knead the dough. Then you pour the “Gregorio Cortez” tomato sauce... see how it runs... some pachuco pepperonis... olives from Miami... Vice. Add some “American Me” cheese. You stick it in the oven, wait till it’s farmworker brown, take it out, put it in a box, get in your lowrider and deliver it to the barrio! (103)

Beyond the comedic references to other Olmos’ television and film performances, this last commentary by the pachuco-Escalante character is trying to repress the previous homoerotic act by providing other alternative (and very heterosexual-acting) performances of Chicano masculinity. The pachuco-Escalante character has probably realized that his previous presentation of Chicano masculinity was not as inclusive as it could be, but rather than acknowledging the characters’ obvious queer desire, he focuses on other possible subjectivities.

However, the alternative subjectivities suggested by the pizza ingredients are equally restrictive and stereotypical. The first reference is to the Robert M. Young television film The Ballad of Gregorio Cortez (1982), which tells the story of the famous incident in 1901 that inspired the corrido of Gregorio Cortez and created the myth around this figure. The film stars Olmos as Gregorio Cortez, who is falsely accused of murder and then cruelly gunned down by the Texas Rangers. By citing this performance as the initial ingredient, Culture Clash is tracing here not only the media portrayal of the Chicano male, but also the development of Chicano Studies. The reference also alludes to Américo Paredes' seminal book, With His Pistol in His Hand: A Border Ballad and its Hero (1958) which was the basis for the Young film. Paredes' book is one of the precursors to Chicano Cultural Studies and a foundational text in folklore and border studies. Gregorio Cortez, like Henry Reyna (aka Henry Leyvas) in Zoot Suit, represents a mythical figure that is victimized by Texas Anglos due to racism and cultural misunderstanding. His story and heroic death (as told by Paredes and the film) elevate him to the heights of a cultural hero to represent Chicanos everywhere. Like the pachuco, however, Gregorio Cortez is found to be equally problematic to today's Chicanos in Culture Clash's skit.

After Gregorio Cortez and another reference to pachucos, the pizza needs olives from Miami. This is a reference to Olmos' supporting role in the popular 1980s series Miami Vice. In the series, Olmos played Cuban American police Lieutenant Martin Castillo. While the main characters played by Don Johnson and Philip Michael Thomas were portrayed as over-the-top fashion-conscious playboys, Olmos' Castillo was quiet, reclusive, and conservative. This particular role helped Olmos establish himself as a television actor, a medium in which he still is active today. Culture Clash's reference casts Olmos' participation in Miami Vice as odd, as olives are not usually from Miami. Similarly, Olmos as Castillo is out of character along with his other performances.

The next ingredient is the cheese, which references Olmos' directorial debut in American Me. Based on a true-life story, American Me chronicles the creation of the Mafia Mexicana gang in the California prison system. The plot centers on the fictional character of Pedro Santana (played by Olmos) who is unjustly jailed and forced to survive by creating a powerful gang within prison. Santana is based on the real-life former leader of the Mafia Mexicana, Rodolfo Cadena. The film gathered mixed reviews from critics and proved to be controversial among Chicanos. The PBS taped version of "Stand and Deliver Pizza" omits this mention of American Me. I read the mention of the film in the script as another allusion to a stereotypical performance by Olmos. This time the actor performs the incarcerated cholo who must use violence to survive in an unjust and racist system.

It is no accident that all these ingredients refer to male-centric films and narratives. Culture Clash suggests that the Olmos pizza is a composite of roles and performances that rely on an understanding of the Chicano experience as male, heterosexual, lower class, angry, and forced into violent behavior. In order to make this point even clearer, the instructions say that the pizza needs to become "farm worker brown" in order to be ready to be sent to the barrio. Culture Clash humorously refers here to the Chicano master narrative, which privileges narratives about the experience of farm workers and signals that to be the quintessential Chicano experience. It is interesting to note, however, that none of the Olmos roles mentioned nor any of the characters in the skit are actually farm workers. Thus, the creation of the pizza through the addition of stereotypical urban performances by Olmos produces an equally unauthentic end result. The pizza is supposed to be a metaphor for the American dream, but in fact it produces another stereotype that minimizes the Chicano experience and excludes other subjectivities.

After the instruction on how to make pizza, the three men begin mimicking the making of pizza and the Jackson Five's song "ABC" is heard. The skit ends with them working away as a giant pizza slice prop behind them flies off into the sky.⁶ The published version in the anthology Culture Clash: Life, Death and Revolutionary Comedy (1998), however, provides another epilogue to our story. After the pizza-making workshop, the pachuco-Escalante character has a heart attack (like in the film Stand and Deliver). After rising from the dead, the character tells us what happened to the two characters. In fact, they achieved the Stand and Deliver dream; they melted into modern America and achieved middle class status.

It is revealed through the pachuco-Escalante's words, however, that this ending is not what he truly intended. He says that the cholo became a prominent Hispanic Republican politician and the rockero a famous brain surgeon in Malibu. They both also became "REAL, real good buddies" (103) implying that their attraction continued. These characteristics attributed to them by the pachuco-Escalante character (Hispanic, surgeon in Malibu) along with the lasting bond between the cholo and the rockero suggest that he failed in his Chicano project because he did not allow them to create their own subjectivities. The result was that they chose to create identities outside of Chicanidad. As the skit closes, the cholo tries to testify in Congress that he is not corrupt and did not "smoke crack with that 'ho!" The cholo's language suggests a mockery of the former mayor of Washington DC Marion Barry. The rockero is seen in an operating room behaving like a hysterical prima donna. The pachuco-Escalante ends the skit with a hopeful comment about how "We're working it out... sí se puede Raza! Órale!" (104). As he says this, the three characters strike the pachuco pose as "In the Mood" plays again, and as with the PBS taped version, the pizza slice becomes a rocket and flies away.

Queering the Chicano Experience

In an article on Latino performance, David Román criticizes Culture Clash's earlier work like A Bowl of Beings for reinforcing "a type of cultural nationalism that collapses all Latino experience into a unified (heterosexual male) subject. In short, by failing to account for the differences among Latinos, Culture Clash inadvertently performs the very limits of the identity politics they practice" (Román 158). Román's reading of Culture Clash is in tension with what I try to argue here about Chicano subjectivities. While Román sees the collapsing into a single identity (perhaps the one promoted by the pachuco-Escalante), I see the creation of multiple narratives about subjectivity through the exploration and reversal of different stereotypes.

Culture Clash attempts what José Estebán Muñoz labels as "disidentification" in their performance of Chicano identity. Muñoz's term refers to the performative practices of queer minority artists that rely on mainstream culture in order to create their own counter identities. In his analysis of Carmelita Tropicana and Ela Troyano, Muñoz describes comedic disidentification as accomplishing an “important cultural critique while at the same time providing cover from, and enabling the avoidance itself of, scenarios of direct confrontation with phobic and reactionary ideologies” (119). In “Stand and Deliver Pizza,” the presence of the pachuco-Escalante character and his admonishment of queer transgressions provide the necessary cover to allow a homoerotic text to emerge. Culture Clash is not only relying on mainstream stereotypes about Chicano identities, but also is relying on Chicano-made stereotypes. These are based on the constant negotiation between Chicano artists and performances, as evidenced by the multiple identities played by Olmos.

The homophobia exhibited by the pachuco-Escalante alludes more to a Chicano understanding of male subjectivity than a mainstream assumption of heterosexuality. Although one could argue that the harsh repression of the pachuco-Escalante and the eventual deracinated future identities of the cholo and rockero (as narrated by the pachuco-Escalante, of course) in fact suggest that hetero-normativity prevails and queer desire has been effectively erased from the Chicano experience, both the skit’s end and the skit itself provide a counter narrative that creates the possibility of queer subjectivities and desires.

In Chicano Drama, Jorge Huerta discusses the struggles of playwrights and performers to insert queer subjectivities into their work. Huerta especially highlights the paucity of queer theater texts as an indication of the politicized and controversial nature of queer performance. In this context, Culture Clash’s skit is more radical than it superficially seems. In the disidentification tradition established by other artists, Culture Clash subverts masculinity through the introduction of a queer subtext that cannot be ignored by the audience.

The skit’s end proves that the queer subtext remains and has in fact not excluded the cholo and the rockero from forming Chicano identities, as previously suggested. As the pachuco-Escalante remarks, the characters continued as “REAL, real good buddies” (103), a clear euphemism for a gay relationship. More importantly, although the final scenes directed by the pachuco-Escalante character suggest that the cholo became a Hispanic Republican politician and the rockero a brain surgeon in Malibu, the audience can choose to ignore this epilogue as it is then contradicted by the final words in the skit that suggest identity is a work in progress as the characters assume the pachuco pose. The presentation of a possible alternative ending alludes to the conclusion of Zoot Suit, where different finales are given to the audience. Culture Clash chooses not to be specific as to what the finales might be, but the character's pachuco pose suggests that their identities are a manifestation of Chicano masculinity, not something outside of it.

Notes

1 A common misconception is to simply label Culture Clash as a "Chicano" comedy troupe. In fact, although noticeably influenced by Chicano theater, the group's ethnic origins and theoretical influences are far wider. Salinas was born in El Salvador, Sigüenza is of Salvadorean origin, and Montoya identifies as a Chicano and is the son of the Movimiento poet José Montoya. Their performance art is influenced by a self-acknowledged amalgam of Teatro Campesino, Movimiento performance and poetry, and mainstream American popular culture, including Jerry Springer and The Brady Bunch (Monaghan 11).

2 There are some noticeable differences between the taped 1992 PBS performance and the 1998 published script; relevant changes are addressed in this article. Unless noted, all direct quotes are from the 1998 published version.

3 The word ganas roughly translates to will power; but in the original 1988 film Stand and Deliver and in Culture Clash's skit, it denotes the Mexican expression that refers to a person's interior capacity to overcome all odds to achieve a specific goal. As with other Mexican expressions used in the skit, the pachuco-Escalante character delivers the word ganas through an exaggerated physical and linguistic recreation of the original Olmos performance.

4 Throughout this article, I refer to the composite character as "pachuco-

Escalante—as both performances are embodied in Sigüenza's role. At strategic times, the character will favor one identity over the other in order to manipulate the audience and the two other characters, but he will quickly revert to combining both identities through his exaggerated physical and linguistic moves. In the article, I note the strategic instances when one identity is emphasized over another.

5 Culture Clash chooses Glen Miller's "In the Mood," which also appears in Valdez's play.

6 The flying pizza might be a coded reference to Olmos' role in Ridley Scott's 1982 film Blade Runner. In the film, Olmos plays Garf, a futuristic Los Angeles cop who speaks an urban hybrid language that combines vocabulary and slang from multiple languages. Olmos' character in the film can be read as an updated pachuco given his elaborate outfit that echoes a zoot suit and his constant use of unintelligible and untranslated dialogue (created by Olmos himself for the film). Although a minor character, Garf is the only one who solves the mystery surrounding Harrison Ford's character and decides to allow his character to escape with his love interest from Los Angeles.

Works Cited

American Me. Dir. Edward James Olmos. Perf. Edward James Olmos. Universal, 1992.

The Ballad of Gregorio Cortez. Dir. Robert M. Young. Perf. Edward James Olmos. Moctezuma Esparza Productions, 1982.

Blade Runner. Dir. Ridley Scott. Perf. Harrison Ford, Sean Young, and Edward James Olmos. Ladd Company, 1982.

A Bowl of Beings: Revolutionary Comedy About Life, Death and Pizza. Dir. Bruce Logan and Jose Luis Valenzuela. Perf. Culture Clash. Esparza/Katz and thirteen/WNET in association with KCET, 1992.

Broyles-González, Yolanda. El Teatro Campesino: Theater in the Chicano

Movement. Austin: U of Texas P, 1994.

Culture Clash. Culture Clash: Life, Death and Revolutionary Comedy. New York: Theater Communications Group, 1998.

Huerta, Jorge. Chicano Drama: Performance, Society and Myth. Cambridge: Cambridge UP, 2000.

Madrid, Arturo. "In Search of the Authentic Pachuco: An Interpretative Essay." Velvet Barrios: Popular Culture and Chicana/o Sexualities. Ed. Alicia Gaspar de Alba. New York: Palgrave, 2003. 17-40.

Miami Vice. Perf. Don Johnson, Michael Philip Thomas, and Edward James Olmos. NBC: 1984-1989.

Monaghan, Constance. "Mambo Combo." American Theater 15:3 (March 1998): 10-14.

Muñoz, José Esteban. Disidentifications: Queers of Colors and the Performance of Politics. Minneapolis: U of Minnesota P, 1999.

Paredes, Américo. With His Pistol in His Hand: A Border Ballad and its Hero. Austin: U of Texas P, [1958] 1971.

Román, David. "Latino Performance and Identity." Aztlán: Journal of Chicano Studies 22.2 (Fall 1997): 151-67.

Stand and Deliver. Dir. Ramón Menéndez. Perf. Edward James Olmos. Warner Home Video, 1988.

Valdez, Luis. Zoot Suit and Other Plays. Houston: Arte Público, 1992.

Zoot Suit. Dir. Luis Valdez. Perf. Edward James Olmos. Mark Taper Forum and Universal, 1991.