1992

Fritz Rudolf Fries: Die Väter im Kino

Colin B. Grant
Heriot-Watt University, Edinburgh

Follow this and additional works at: http://newprairiepress.org/gdr

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 4.0 License.

Recommended Citation

This Review is brought to you for free and open access by New Prairie Press. It has been accepted for inclusion in GDR Bulletin by an authorized administrator of New Prairie Press. For more information, please contact cads@k-state.edu.
Hacks's work in this area. Part One is particularly valuable since it contains a synopsis of each major work. The reader may or may not be interested in the analyses of the works, particularly those in Part Two. The book can also help to inform about Peter Hacks in general, not just as the author of children's literature. Another very valuable part of this study is its exhaustive bibliography. It includes critiques of children's works by Hacks, theoretical works on children's literature by Hacks, 66 entries of children's literature by Peter Hacks (multiple editions of the same work are listed), translations by Hacks of children's literature, and translations of Peter Hacks's children's literature.

Thomas Di Napoli not only undertook extensive research on Peter Hacks and his entire body of work, but personally interviewed and corresponded with him for clarification about his work for children. This is a major work of research and analysis and an invaluable tool for anyone interested in children's literature and/or in Peter Hacks.

Judith H. Cox
Birmingham-Southern College

Fritz Rudolf Fries is best known for his novel Der Weg nach Oobliadoob which, although first published (in the Federal Republic) in 1966, was to appear in the GDR only in 1989. Fries was born in 1935 in Bilbao in the Basque country and moved with his family in 1942 to Leipzig. The reader can clearly see that the writer's personal history has also informed his latest novel Die Väter im Kino.

In his Nachwort, Fries writes that the novel describes the preparations for the film version of his 1974 novel Das Luft-Schiff (directed by Rainer Simon), but adds that the description is based on a free adaptation spiced by the author's imagination. The central protagonist of the novel is the inventor of airships, Franz Xaver Stannebein, the (fictive) author's grandfather, taken from Das Luft-Schiff. At its basic level, the novel traces the biography of Stannebein from his stay in the Basque country to his return to the Germany of the Third Reich where, upon submitting his ideas about air travel to a Reich ministry, he is declared insane and incarcerated. Until the end of the war, authority rests with the women of the family.

However, the novel is thematically and formally more complex than pure historical biography: the narration of Stannebein's life and family is alienated by the interpolation of exchanges between the first-person narrator and his Dramaturg, Hiob, in their discussion of the film, an ironic-satirical critique of orthodox socialist realism, and by the fact that it is not Stannebein's life itself which is being narrated but Simon's film. Part of the challenge of the novel derives from this multilayered character and self-reflective style reminiscent of a major trend in prose literature in the GDR since the early 1980s.

The title indicates a number of themes explored in the novel: one is the patriarchal world as the world of authority ("Ordnung gehört zu unserer väterlichen Authorität," narrator, 266). The biography of Stannebein's family coincides with the high tide of totalitarianism (Hitler, Stalin, Franco, Mussolini) and war which is described as the "Vater aller Dinge" (64).

Fries also explores the theme of history and its appropriation (by means of memory, film, and literature). The narrator's account of Stannebein's family history clearly deviates from official historiography here: he and Hiob invent hypothetical characters mixed from history and fantasy. Hiob describes film as "eine zentrische Kunst, jedes Ausscheren aus der heiligen Bannmeile der Hauptfigur verletzt die Proportionen..." (210)—in other words, a world of order which the narrator describes as a "Vater-Kunst par excellence."

The comments of the narrator on memory greatly assist in reading and understanding of the novel: "Was ist Erinnerung? Seit Anbeginn der Welt stirbt die Erinnerung mit den Toten. Solange wir leben, versuchen wir Erinnerung weiterzugeben, am Leben zu halten, und was dabei herauskommt ist der Roman dieser Welt. Verkommt Wahrheit durch zu große Vergegenwärtigung zu einem Kino von der Welt? Oder ist Fiktion das Elixier, das uns allen genießen läßt, was vor unserer Zeit war, doch ohne den Stachel der Verantwortung?" (20). Barely two years after the revolution in the German Democratic Republic, Fries's appeal for resistance to the "Sog der Auslöschung" could not be more appropriate.

Colin B. Grant
Heriot-Watt University, Edinburgh